“This book shows that from an economic point of view with strong credentials in terms of epistemic justice, allocative efficiency is about the maximisation of consumer welfare rather than total welfare. But that is only the first part of the argument. This book also shows that the legal structures most closely connected with the allocation of resources in a market economy (antitrust and consumer law) are designed and practised in a way that fits with the goal of maximising consumer welfare”.

Fabrizio Esposito (PhD, EUI) is an Assistant Professor in Private Law, NOVA School of Law, Lisbon. His research focuses on the interaction between law and economics (“the legal-economic nexus”), with special attention to market regulation and technology. He has co-edited two volumes: Research Methods in Consumer Law (with H-W Micklitz and A-L Sibony; EE 2018) and Economics in Legal Reasoning (with P Cserne; Palgrave 2020) and is co-editing with Mateusz Grochowski a book on price personalization for Cambridge University Press.
